THE CLASH OF CIVILISATIONS

March's News

» Jump in Jobless

At 1.5 million, 5.2% of the working-age population, unemployment has reached its highest figure in 13 years. Last year some 108,000 people lost their jobs, according to the Office for National Statistics. A further record of almost 8 million people are "economically inactive", a category that includes long-term sick, students and stay-at-home mothers and fathers.

How can the Government, with the apparent backing of the Tories and Lib Dems, continue to allow immigrants to pour into Britain at a rate of nearly half a million a year?

Apart from dependents of those already here, most of them are now given "work permits" instead of being called "asylum seekers". The percentage who are doctors or of some high professional or technical standing is miniscule - and we must now have our full requirement of Polish plumbers. The truth is that employers prefer to use cheap imported labour for unskilled and semi-skilled jobs rather than pay a decent wage to our own people prepared to do the less desirable work.

» Australia 'Will Be Muslim In 50 Years'

Australia could abort itself out of existence and become a Muslim country within 50 years if a new abortion-inducing pill is made available, said Danna Vale, a former Australian minister and a Liberal Party MP, last month. The drug, known as RU486, could drastically reduce the country's native-born, largely European population.

Mrs Vale referred to comments of an imam in Sydney's Lakemba mosque that Australia is going to be a Muslim nation in 50 years' time. "I didn't believe him at the time, but when you actually look at the birth rate... we are aborting ourselves almost out of existence by 100,000 abortions a year. You multiply that by 50 years and that's five million potential Australians we won't have here."

This, of course, is exactly what is happening back in Britain and the rest of Europe, where it is on an even bigger scale. As is also the abuse that Mrs Vale received from the liberal-left Establishment's media for trying to warn of national suicide.

» Race Attack on Ripper Tour

It was revealed in an East London local paper that a group, including children, on a tour of Jack the Ripper haunts were attacked by a gang of Bangladeshi origin youths wielding iron bars and fence posts and shouting: "Get off our f.....g turf."

Tour guide Denise Allen said: "I have heard of other cases but the police do not seem to want to investigate". We can only assume that this is because of orders from the Met's top brass that they must not appear to pick on Muslim youth.

A former landlady of an East End pub told your editor that in the same area around Tower Bridge during the 2004 London Marathon, some Bangladeshi youths threw stones at some of the runners. This was not reported in any newspaper or shown on the TV cameras (BBC) covering the event.

We must give credit where it is due and acknowledge that Mohammad Sarwar, the Labour MP for Glasgow Central, said recently that some communities in parts of London, Scotland and the North of England are being terrorised by Black and Asian gangs, but in many cases the police have failed to act. Sarwar said that as a result of the Macpherson report "the pendulum has swung too far the other way".

» More Protests on Peerages for Labour Donors

Tony Blair's blatant acts of getting Labour Party donors rewarded with a seat in the House of Lords has again raised objections even from backbench MPs. They state that one of the latest donors proposed for a peerage, Dr Chair Patel, who has made a fortune running nursing homes and clinics, had been questioned by the British Medical Council over the treatment of patients at a Twickenham, London, nursing home he used to run. Dr Patel told the BMC that he stepped down as chief executive when it was sold in 2002. See Sunday Times 29.01.06.

» Do We Need Somalis?

The sickening murder of a Leeds policewoman by a Somali gang served to highlight the fact that of all the ethnic groups now living in Britain, the Somalis appear to have the highest percentage of violent criminals. They would even give Jamaican Yardies a run for their money, and if there is nobody else around to attack then they will murder their own.

A case in point was the murder of a Somali teenager in London's Camden Town by a 25-strong Somali gang in what was believed to be a turf war over drugs. The police commandeered a London bus to take them off to the 'nick'.

As only 12% of Somali immigrants are in employment (according to Aidan Hartley, writing in The Spectator 21.01.06), should we not deport the other 88%?

» It is not by chance that the BNP's two main publications are called Identity and The Voice of Freedom. Our strong and consistent campaign to call a halt to non-European immigration is not motivated by a hatred of those who have flooded into this country, but by our recognition of the fact that in order to save our culture, our way of life, we must first preserve our national identity. As Arnold Toynbee wrote; "Civilisations die from suicide, not murder".

A prerequisite of this campaign to preserve our identity is the need to defend freedom of speech, which was epitomised by the partial victory of Nick Griffin and Mark Collett at Leeds Crown Court. The key issue here was the right to criticise a religion or criminality among another race, even if those criticised might consider it insulting, as long as that criticism does not call for or provoke violence upon the specific religion or race. Although the BNP duo were acquitted on six so-called 'race hate' charges, the Home Office, echoing some of New Labour's crypto-communist beliefs, are not content to let the matter drop and has set a retrial in October for those charges on which the jury could not reach a decision.

Since January we have seen New Labour launch further parliamentary attacks upon our freedoms with the further progress of the Bill to introduce Identity Cards, the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill (What's that? Read on) and, in your editor's opinion, the total ban on smoking in public. It is indeed ironic that the most active party in defence of freedom and true democracy in Britain today is abused as 'fascist' by its most vigorous and vicious opponents.

Our basis for opposing compulsory identity cards is not just a question of their cost; now likely to be at least £15 billion, i.e. more than half our annual defence budget. The complexity of detail on personal information that an ID card will carry will mean that the government of the day would have almost complete control of each individual's actions, including knowing which party he or she was likely to vote for. Also, the data base created would be a very attractive target for terrorists and/or criminals to hack into.

The Marxists, of all shades of pink, who control the Labour Party are content for many law-abiding people to continue thinking: "I've got nothing to hide, so what's wrong with an identity card? It will stop the terrorists and the benefit fraudsters."

Spain had identity cards, but it did not stop the Madrid train bombings. If we had ID cards it would not have stopped our home-grown Muslim 7/7 London bombers. As for curtailing benefit frauds and credit card scams, Philip Johnston, Home Affairs Editor of the Daily Telegraph, 03.02.06, said this was "claptrap" and that "ID cards could make identity theft worse, not better". In any case, only 2% of benefit fraud results from false identities.

The extraordinary Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, which has already had two readings in the House of Commons without hardly a word of criticism, could do away with centuries of our law and liberty. This is because it would give ministers power to amend, repeal or replace any legislation simply by making an order and without having to bring a Bill before Parliament where it would be subject to discussion. Such dictatorial powers are, of course, already enjoyed by the mainly unelected Brussels bureaucrats of the EU, and it is no coincidence that some of them are former commissars in the East European lands of the old Soviet Empire.

If the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill becomes law then there will not really be much point in having more than a hundred or so MPs. All that will be required are party apparatchiks to rubber stamp ever increasing legislation that is never debated or voted upon.

No Freedom of Choice for Smokers

I used to smoke three to four small cigars a day, but gave them up nearly a year ago. They made me wheeze in my advancing years and smell like a bonfire. Out of cussedness I am highly tempted to buy a packet to show my sympathy with the smokers in my local who next year will be denied the choice of damaging their health, if they want to (this pub has had a non-smoking bar for over three years for those who don't want to inhale other people's smoke). For that is what this Government Bill prohibiting smoking in public places and private clubs is all about; a further nail in the coffin of choice. One of the worst to suffer will be working men's clubs, where a fag with their pint has been traditional. But nanny knows best - and don't try and answer her back.

Space does not permit a list of the long line of restrictions on our freedom of choice imposed by post-war Labour and Conservative Governments, so don't think that the anti-smoking Bill is the end of it. The way control over our lives is heading it would not be beyond the realms of possibility to see a law enacted calling for the demolition of all trees within a mile of a school or a public recreation ground as small boys have a habit of falling out of them and breaking bones.

Our Fight in the Culture Clash

» Nick Griffin examines the next step we should take following Huntington's recommendations in his "Clash of Civilisations" thesis. This includes a re-examination of the reality of "Jewish power", and what the attitude of nationalists should now be as the 'wheels of history' turn ever faster.

» "The Clash of Civilisations." Harvard Professor Samuel Huntington used this phrase to describe his thesis that the old Cold War division of the world between the two superpowers is being replaced by revived tensions between civilisations:

"The intra-civilizational clash of political ideas spawned by the West is being supplanted by an inter-civilizational clash of culture and religion."

Despite some ritual nods to Political Correctness, the bulk of the book could have been written by a genuine American nationalist. It explains how globalisation is producing a reaction in terms of increasing the importance of traditional identities and ethnic loyalties. Huntington doesn't want the 'clash' he foresees, and repeatedly stresses that the way to avoid it is to settle down in a 'multi-civilizational' world in which the West rejects multiculturalism and One World globalism, and looks after its own interests.

Huntington is certainly no rose-spectacled leftist. He highlights the stresses that economic globalisation places on previously liberal societies and uses explicitly nationalist phraseology in explaining what will come next:

"In coping with identity crisis, what counts for people are blood and belief, faith and family. People rally to those with similar ancestry, religion, language, values and institutions and distance themselves from different ones."

Assorted right-wing conspiracy theorists have condemned The Clash of Civilisations as 'neo-con propaganda', and it is certainly true that the pro-Zionist 'neo-con' lobby which has a great deal of influence with Bush & Co. have appropriated the phrase for their own use. But Huntington's key points are as far from the Bush/Blair position as possible:

"The underlying problem for the West is not Islamic fundamentalism. It is Islam, a different civilization whose people are convinced of the superiority of their culture and obsessed with the inferiority of their power. The problem for Islam is not the CIA or the U.S. Department of Defence. It is the West, a different civilization whose people are convinced of the universality of their culture and believe that their superior, if declining, power imposes on them the obligation to extend that culture throughout the world."

'MODERATE' MUSLIMS

The neo-cons want to invade the Middle East and hunt down 'fundamentalist terrorists', while waxing lyrical about 'the supposed 'moderation' of the Muslims whose presence and power they are so busily encouraging in our Western homelands. Huntington sees a Clash of Civilisations, they see only a clash between 'extremists' on one side and the USA and yet-to-be-discovered-but we're-sure-they're-there moderate Muslims on the other.

A further crucial distinction between Huntington and the neo-cons is that he acknowledges that the planting of Israel in the Middle East is a major factor in the reawakening of Islamic militancy. The neo-cons and their bought-and-paid-for politicians deny this simple fact. Even more important, now that this particular die has been cast, he warns against further Middle Eastern adventurism.

At the end of his list of proposals for minimising the impact of the Clash, Huntington writes that it is: "Most important, to recognize that Western intervention in the affairs of other civilizations is probably the single most dangerous source of instability and potential global conflict in a multi-civilizational world."

Finally, he rejects multi-culturalism: "The clash between the multi-culturalists and the defenders of Western civilization and the American Creed is, in James Kurth's phrase, 'the real clash' within the American segment of Western civilization. American's cannot avoid the issue: Are we a Western people or are we something else? The futures of the United States and of the West depend on Americans reaffirming their commitment to Western civilization.

Domestically this means rejecting the divisive siren calls of multi-culturalism. Internationally it means rejecting the elusive and illusory calls to identify the United States with Asia."

The potential impact of Huntington's book may perhaps be gauged by looking at whose endorsements are printed on the back cover: "The Clash of Civilizations is one of the most important books to have emerged since the end of the Cold War", writes Henry Kissinger. "An intellectual tour de force: bold, imaginative and provocative. A seminal work that will revolutionize our understanding of international affairs," opines Zbigniew Brzezinski.

Here we have two of the biggest of the Big Beasts of late 20th Century global power politics promoting a book that is far closer in its view of the world to us than it is to any other political party in Britain. These are men who, together with their fellow members of the Council on Foreign Relations - the powerful and rather secretive pro-One World 'think-tank' which first allowed Huntington to air his thesis in its in-house magazine - nationalists of my generation were brought up to regard as lying at the very core of a wide-ranging 'conspiracy' for One World government - an agenda which by the end of the Cold War came to be known as the New World Order.

But here we are, just a few years later, and these one-time arch-globalists appear to be asking us to believe that they have switched sides to be with us, the good guys.

What is going on? Perhaps they are just so vain that they can't bear to be recorded by history as fools who failed to see "the next big thing" and so are dropping old dogmas they now see failing - just as it is now very difficult to find anyone in Eastern Europe who ever believed in Communism.

Or perhaps there's more to it than that. For the question arises again when one looks at the identical U-turn which appears to be going on in sections of the American mass media, where the liberal/One World/Zionist tendencies that so dominated American, and hence Western, cultural and political life in recent decades have enormous influence.

POISON FROM HOLLYWOOD

Again, nationalists of my generation were brought up to see the anti-white, anti-patriotic, anti-human poison that spewed endlessly out of Hollywood and the multinational media conglomerates as the work of the same power elite and a consequence of their cold-blooded determination to wipe European cultural and ethnic identity from the face of the globe.

Looking objectively at the output from those same studios and corporations in recent years, however, someone unaware of their role in the second half of the last century could form a very different picture. Dances With Wolves seems to have ended the era when all white men seemed to do was to slaughter innocent Red Indians or sire inbred children with their hillbilly cousins. More typical since then have been tales of good old fashioned daring-do, such as Black Hawk Down.

Right-wing 'shock-jocks' dominate commercial radio in the USA and, increasingly, Britain as well. Of course we don't agree with their entire message, but much of their output is a hundred times healthier than the liberal-left poison that was the standard fare not so long ago.

Look at the last couple of really big film blockbusters: The Lord of the Rings trilogy was enjoyed by millions of our people as a beautifully filmed ripping yarn at the conscious level. Subconsciously, though, it would have been taken - as the visionary Tolkien intended - as a powerful myth to comfort and encourage the peoples of the English-speaking world in a coming time of desperate danger.

At that level, the Orcs and the turban-wearing Southrons are not fantasy figures, but metaphors for the Third World hordes now threatening to swamp the West with the help of our own treacherous ruling class, isolated from reality in their own tall towers. No doubt those who actually made this, probably the most inspirational call for action to save the West in the history of the cinema, intended merely to stick as closely as possible to the original story. But they would never have been allowed to do so by the Hollywood of an earlier time, at least not without portraying Sauron as Adolf Hitler and turning the Riders of Rohan into noble Rastafarians.

In the form in which it was made, Lord of the Rings was a money-spinner and a cinematic masterpiece. But it was also war propaganda, serving to put an end to decades of the promotion of pacifism, white guilt and cowardice. It will give a new generation of white youngsters the moral steel to stand up on their hind legs and fight. It was distributed by New Line Cinema, a subsidiary of movie giant Time Warner, once one of the greatest producers of anti-white poison on the planet.

Even more recently, the film of the C.S. Lewis classic, The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe, introduced a younger audience to themes of heroism, sacrifice and the need to fight for Christian values against an evil and cruel foe. Future instalments in this Chronicles of Narnia series are likely to make the point even more effectively, since the enemy in several of them is recognisably 'Middle Eastern'.

Responsible for this early lesson in civilisational clashes is Walt Disney, a company that moved a very long way from its patriotic, family-values roots when taken over by the liberal/One World/Zionist sharks now trading as the Buena Vista corporation. A few years ago, as well as making millions rehashing fairy tales, this company was repeatedly condemned by Christian and pro-white activists in the USA as a hotbed of sleaze and cultural distortion. Now it seems they're moving to our side. Once again, what's going on?

Finally, for those who don't go to the cinema but have satellite TV, compare and contrast a repeat episode of Mash with Fox TV's (i.e. Rupert Murdoch's) latest Iraq war soap opera Over There. Set in the Korean War, Mash was self-consciously dedicated to destroying the morale and confidence of Middle America during the Vietnam War (a conflict, incidentally, into which the USA should never have strayed). Cowardice, futile sacrifice and cynicism were the order of the day.

Over There shows a platoon of US marines - white lads with a couple of capable token Afro-Americans, of course - going through their tour of Iraq with a mixture of heroism, chivalrous concern for their enemies and touching humanity. The message - 'our boys' are there to do a tough job, and they deserve our support. The Director is Chris Gerolmo, who in the days when it was fashionable to rubbish white men was responsible for Mississippi Burning.

The contrast between the two fictitious accounts of US overseas adventures could not be more striking. Once again, it is not surprising that many educated white nationalists have noticed and are asking what's going on? Well, pretty obviously, it's war propaganda, no different from the way in which Hollywood worked to create the mood for war in the late 1930s and especially in the early 1940s. The question is, whose war?

To many, especially in the USA itself, the answer is simple: "It's all part of the same conspiracy." Precisely which conspiracy is a matter of taste:

"The Jews who have so much power over American politicians and media outlets have started a long war to make the Middle East safe for Israel. They need our boys to fight and die in that war," claim the anti-Semites.

"Iraq and Iran planned to switch their oil sales from dollars to euros. This would destroy the dollar's value as a reserve currency and bring the American economy to its knees, so both regimes had to go," say alternative economists.

"The Christian fundamentalist right which has such a hold on the Bush regime believe that Armageddon is just around the corner and that helping Israel to fight one last war against her Arab neighbours will bring the end times and the return of Jesus Christ," declare the secular liberals.

"The big US corporations need new markets and people in the Bush administration stand to make fortunes out of reconstruction contracts in the Middle East, so they need American soldiers to go in and destroy the things that they'll profit from rebuilding," allege the anti-capitalist left.

"The US Establishment knows that seizing control of Arabia's oil reserves is the only way to survive in the post-Peak Oil world, so they need our boys to get in there and occupy the desert oil fields," charge the one-track Peak Oilers.

Who's right? The most realistic assessment is that there is at least a grain of truth in each of them. As a rough rule of thumb, anyone who claims that the answer to any big political puzzle in our complex world in one simple fact is a crackpot.

There are, however, several important points that those who favour the first explanation need to consider.

The ex-Trotskyite Jewish tendency that is politely described as 'neo-conservative' and which carries a great deal of clout in Washington DC certainly do have their own reasons of tribal loyalty for wanting to persuade the USA and Britain to take out potential threats to Israel in the Middle East.

LIKUDNIKS

Israel's ruling Likud party in particular has invested large amounts of intelligence effort and grubby money in building a network of well-placed supporters through which to exert push-and-pull pressure on various overseas governments and populations. Where's the surprise? That's what normal ruling elites do.

The problem is that it's been so long since our own masters acted in such ways that they look abnormal, and confer such huge advantages on nations that still work that way that it looks unfair on those of us who live in ones which do not. It's not the rulers of Israel who are acting wrongly, so much as the rulers of Britain and America.

A common belief among doctrinaire anti-Semites or anti-New World Order enthusiasts (the two are generally interchangeable) is that "the Jews" or "the Bilderbergers" or "the international bankers", or whatever label is used, are involved in a single monolithic 'conspiracy' to have their wicked way around the world.

At certain points in history, one or other group of powerful 'conspirators'

(and anyone who believes that the super-powerful and ultra rich don't scheme and plot to further enhance their power and wealth is a fool or a liar) have undoubtedly worked as one to impose their will on the unwitting mass of humanity.

But at other times, the ruling elites have themselves undergone enormous changes and struggled against each other in vicious faction fights. Cecil Rhodes and Alfred Milner, for example, tried to use their enormous wealth or influence to further the cause of English world domination, only for their creations to be hijacked by others with very different loyalties.

The Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 is another fine example: Conspiracy theorists rightly point to the role of American-Jewish bankers such as Schiff and Warburg in financing Lenin and Trotsky's coup d'etat. In their effort to lay every bad turn in history at the door of "the Jews" as a single entity, however, they ignore the fact that - after the Romanovs and the long-suffering Russian people - the Rothschilds were the biggest losers as they were the biggest of the 'French' investors who lost all the investments with which they had funded the extraordinarily rapid industrialisation of pre-war Czarist Russia.

It is true that, for historic reasons involving reaction to generations of persecution, many leading Bolsheviks were Jews, but it is utterly false to say that most Jews were Bolsheviks. Most were ordinary working-class people, not interested in politics.

Many other young idealists were by that time committed Zionists, their dreams and efforts focussed on establishing a Jewish state in a carbon-copy of the romantic nationalism that also led large numbers of young Italians, Germans, Czechs, Irishmen and so on to dedicate themselves to winning their own national freedom. The Irish in particular also made use of the power afforded them by their own diaspora. The Jews were unique only at doing it better than everybody else, and at being immune to the post-World War Two guilt complex that played such a role in ending all the other European intrusions into what is now the Third World.

As post-Lenin Soviet Russia

became increasingly anti-Jewish, more and more Jews around the world turned away from Communism. Coupled with the astute Zionist use of events such as the Eichmann trial to increase fears of anti-Semitic persecution and so build support for the state of Israel, it is really not surprising that, by the end of the 20th century, the vast majority of Jews were broadly supportive of their national state, even if they didn't want to go and live there themselves.

Furthermore, since the greatest danger to their survival had come from consciously pro-white political movements in European countries, it is really no surprise that post-war generations in particular tended - consciously or subconsciously - to use whatever influence they had to encourage trends that would weaken white cohesion and pride. Given the unusually high concentration of ethnocentrism among Jews (something for which they have naturally self-selected through generations living as a diaspora) why on earth should anyone expect anything else?

But times change. The wheels of history, frozen in Europe from 1945 until 1989, began to roll again as the Wall came down, and have been spinning faster and faster ever since. The rise of radicalised Islam - from the fall of the Shah of Iran through to events such as the Palestinian Intifada, 9/11 and the Islamification of Europe by immigration, stealth and violence - has thrown a huge new extra factor into the equation.

Because there never was a monolithic "Jewish conspiracy" - as opposed to a natural tendency among more Jews than Gentiles to put their own ethnic group first - it is entirely predictable that, faced with such a totally new factor, different Jews will change their now outdated position at different rates and in different ways.

Thus we see neo-cons such as Richard Perle pushing for the USA and her poodle allies to 'remake' the entire Middle East, 'democratising' (i.e. de-Islamifying) the whole region at gunpoint, while simultaneously supporting the multi-cultural destruction of Middle America. But at the same time we have experienced old real politik hands such as Henry Kissinger praising the semi-isolationist proposals of Huntington, and the anti-immigration message of Tony

Many leading Bolsheviks, including Leon Trotsky, were Jewish

Celebrations after Hamas win by an electoral landslide

Blankley's excellent book The West's Last Chance.

Perhaps the simplest explanation of the apparent volte face by the Council on Foreign Relations is that America's big capitalists have woken up to the fact that the Chinese won't need them much longer, and that an Islamified Eurabia would be an economic basket case. When the decline of the West threatens profits, it's only natural for those for whom profit is God to conclude that the decline may not be such a good thing.

THE LIFE RAFT OF THE WEST

Of course, not everyone is motivated by materialism. Significant numbers of assimilated Jews have always sided with their adopted country (witness the thousands of German Jews who, incredible but true, served in Hitler's Wehrmacht, especially in the early years of the war, or the far smaller number who joined and worked loyally in John Tyndall's National Front in the 1970s). But it is also a simple historical fact that many of the post-war generation, ranging from Jerry Rubin to Gerry Gable, did everything in their power to undermine a society run by and for people they believed had tried to wipe their kind from the face of the earth. When you think about it, this really shouldn't have surprised anybody.

Some are still working to that agenda, but others are responding to the changing times that have thrown up a far clearer and more present danger to the survival of their people. The survival of the West has ceased to be a matter of indifference, or even concern, to Jews who want their own people to carry on their long history. As the threat from Palestinian wombs and Islamic terrorism grows stronger year by year, the West becomes ever more important, the only possible life raft for the Jewish people if Israel sinks beneath a Muslim tidal wave.

So we have a new situation, a fresh point in the long and often tragic (on both sides) relationship between gentile Europeans and Jews.

Some Jews are, and will for various reasons probably remain, hostile to us. Others are becoming more sympathetic to the survival of white Europe, either because they feel themselves closer to it than to any of the alternatives, or because within fifty years it could be the only place their grandchildren will find safe refuge from the ocean of bitter hostility that their grandparents' Zionist experiment helped to stir up. Others, especially the neo-cons, will see in our sons cannon fodder for one final desperate gamble to preserve the last surviving example of colonialism from Europe - Israel.

How many fall into which category, and how many just get on with their own lives without even thinking about it, no one can tell. But what we can tell is that the old daggers-drawn hostility is tending to fade. Even the neo-cons who want our boys for their Armageddon option have at least had to drop the worst excesses of the anti-white hatred they harboured when they were Trotskyite revolutionaries.

Their allies in the Hollywood propaganda machine are similarly restricted, to our unintended benefit. Of course they are still churning out miscegenist poison, but we're seeing more wholesome material as well. The seeds of our own nationalist message will find much more fertile soil in a new generation reared on Lord of the Rings and Black Hawk Down rather than Guess Who's Coming To Dinner?

This is an improvement, something arising from the fact that these people are all normal mortals, deservedly caught on the horns of a dilemma largely of their own making, not the 'Spawn of Satan' of crank fantasy.

This does not make the neo-cons our friends. Their relentless drive to frighten, bribe or bully us into their own endless war means that they remain our political enemies. But many Jews who would once have sided with them as a matter of automatic racial loyalty are clearly changing their minds. From those who back the Front National and the Vlaams Belang, to those who work with American Renaissance, a growing number are now rowing in the same direction as we are, working to ensure that we fight and win the Clash of Civilisations where it matters - in our own homelands.

There are still hysterical anti-Semites who clog up the Internet and hand propaganda gifts to the likes of Gerry Gable and Peter Hitchens by lumping all Jews in with the Likudnik neo-con conspiracy to drag us into a new world war. It is time for white nationalists around the world to dump such paranoid political suicide notes in the historical bin where they belong.

There is no "Jewish conspiracy" to poison our wells or to turn subway systems into bombs under our cities. There are, by contrast, a limitless number of Islamic schemes to do precisely that. This is the factor which is going to dominate politics for decades to come. This is the enemy that the public can see and understand. This is the threat that can bring us to power. This is the Big Issue on which we must concentrate in order to wake people up and make them look at what we have to offer all round.

It is not for us to worry unduly about the insane and doomed schemes of the neo-cons. Their setting fire to the entire Middle East won't do their cause a scrap of good. The Law of Unintended Consequences works with particular brutality against ideas whose time is past. It is inconceivable that they can wind up a Clash of Civilisations sufficient to get the West to go in and pull their Israeli and oily chestnuts out of the Islamic flames, without also detonating the ethno-religious timebombs ticking away in every country in Western Europe.

Early in 1917, Lenin told his small band of Bolsheviks that their job was to "turn the war into civil war." If their neo-con descendants fail to see that, this time around, such a development will turn their worst nightmares into reality all over Europe, then that will be their loss, and our great opportunity.

BOOK REVIEWS: Living in the Past

» On a yearly basis, more people visit historic buildings than attend football matches - that's quite some statistic. Due to the depths to which contemporary society in these islands has plunged, the draw of our past is perhaps more prevalent today than at any other time, but in recent years people have wanted to be able to experience the past rather than merely read about it or watch it on television.

This book on 'living history' contains hundreds of photographs from some of the 400 re-enactment events that they stage every year. From recreations of Roman legions on manoeuvres at Richborough in Kent, to the work of thatchers re-roofing a 17th century house, a close eye on authenticity and an unstoppable enthusiasm for participation gets you closer to the action.

This book celebrates those who re-live the battles, pageants and day-to-day lives of our ancestors. Details on living history museums to visit, how to locate and use archival material, and step-by-step guides which show you how to load and fire a flintlock musket, or to arm an Anglo-Saxon Thegn, reveal how you can get a piece of the action. Includes a foreword by David Starkey.

Neo-Conned & Neo-Conned Again

» After 20 months of extensive research, Neo-CONNED! and Neo-CONNED! Again are finished! These two volumes bring together the leading minds and pens of journalism, politics, the military, the intelligence community, and academia for a hard-hitting, no-holds-barred examination of the immorality, the injustice, the illegality, and the insanity of America's aggression against Iraq.

The first volume, Neo-CONNED!, features America's leading "conservative" writers, such as Pat Buchanan, Joe Sobran, Samuel Francis (R.I.P.), Charley Reese, and others, arguing against the ill-fated war in Iraq based on sound ethical and religious principles accepted by not only most American "conservatives" but also by nearly all people of good will. Subtitled "Just War Principles: A Condemnation of War in Iraq," this volume tackles the essential question of whether the war can be justified by Christian just-war principles, and whether, therefore, real "conservatives" should have opposed or supported it.

The second book in the set, Neo-CONNED! Again, brings the writing of leading scholarly and professional figures to bear on issues such as the legality of the war under international law, the intelligence fiasco that allegedly provided support for our entry into the war, the economic and political factors supporting the rush to war, and so much more. Including Noam Chomsky, Milton Viorst, Naomi Klein, Justin Raimondo, W. Patrick Lang, and many, many others, this volume - subtitled "Hypocrisy, Lawlessness, and the Rape of Iraq" lets it rip on the devious and deceitful machinations of those in power led America and Britain into a war that was not only unnecessary but gravely and profoundly wrong.

The Chinese 'Russians' Are Coming

» The BNP has made it clear that we consider the UK Independence Party to have severe limitations, not least in the cynical lip service its leadership gives to pretending to oppose mass immigration when it is standing for election. Nevertheless, we recognise that its membership includes many good patriots who should be in the BNP. One such is Ashley Mote, an MEP. The following is a condensation of an article he wrote under the title of "The Russians Are Coming" for the January issue of the magazine Compass.

» If you thought Britain was overcrowded and already had an immigration problem, get ready for the bad news.

As we all know, since May 2004 we have seen the arrival in the UK of tens of thousands from Eastern Europe, and they are still coming. But that, it seems, is only the start.

Some time next year it is virtually certain that Russians and Chinese will start appearing here in even larger numbers. Let me explain.

The eastern border of Western Europe was well established and well guarded where it stood before the collapse of the Soviet Union. Finland is the best example.

But much of the rest of today's eastern border was once inside the USSR. Today, as then, it has little by way of barriers and patrols. That border stretches from Estonia in the Baltic north to Slovakia and Hungary in the south.

Lithuania, for example, has a 1000-mile border with Belarus protected by derisory policing. Further south, Ukraine butts against Poland, Slovakia and Hungary. Its southern border is with Romania.

Huge stretches of these borders are either dense woodland or mile upon mile of open moors with almost no distinguishing features on the landscape. Even the tiny villages are few and far between. They are occupied entirely by peasant farmers and their immediate families, scratching a living from the unforgiving land.

Today, any Russian wishing to reach the west can walk across the border into Lithuania in a few minutes, without anyone knowing he is there.

But he will find it difficult to get any further. Even if he got into Poland which, unusually, did have border controls with the USSR, the Polish border with Germany is a real one.

But next year everything changes, and for the worse. For eastern Europeans, the words 'free movement' will take on a completely new meaning.

The Schengen Agreement has been signed by most but not all European countries, including independent sovereign states like Norway and Switzerland. It is already in effect. It allows the free movement of people across borders. No passport checks, no visas. Nothing.

Next year, 2007, the Schengen Agreement will apply to Lithuania, Poland, Hungary, Latvia, Estonia, Slovakia, and the Czech Republic - all previously part of the Soviet Union, and all now with inadequate frontier controls with other former Communist countries.

So, next year, if a Russian or a Ukrainian or a Belarusian gets across their border into any of those countries they gain access to the rest of Western Europe. They will have little trouble getting anywhere they choose.

These former Soviet republics are not prison camps any more. They issue passports valid for international travel. Internal passports are a thing of the past.

A few weeks ago I met the British Ambassador in Lithuania, who drew my attention to these facts and their enormous implications. He also commented that I was the first visitor ever to visit him to ask about what was happening on the borders with the former USSR.

(The author then gave details of his visit to Kaliningrad, formerly Koenigsberg, the capital of East Prussia, which was colonised by the Soviets after they had slaughtered most of the German inhabitants in 1945 - Editor)

My guide and interpreter reminded me that Russia has been turning a blind eye to many tens of thousands - if not millions - of Chinese who have crossed the border into Siberia and much of the rest of eastern Russia in recent years. They have escaped from the overcrowded and tightly regulated China into which they were born and now dominate parts of eastern Russia.

These Chinese immigrants have proved far more enterprising than the local population and it has suited the Russian government to see the local economy grow more quickly as a result of Chinese activity there.

But what happens when word of mouth - let alone satellite television - reaches Siberia? What happens when Siberians learn that the Belarusian and Ukrainian borders are porous and leaking people from the east into western Europe?

What happens when they understand the consequences of Schengen being applied to the border of Lithuania and Poland, Hungary and Slovakia? What happens when they find out that tiny Lithuania has a thousand mile border with Belarus and hopelessly inadequate resources to protect it?

Who will be that last Chinese or Russian to turn out the lights before they leave?

If we think we have a problem now, it is likely to pale into insignificance in 2007 and beyond

The Italian politician Franco Frattini was quoted recently as saying "Nobody wants to open this Pandora's box". The politicians know, but they don't want you to know.

But we already know that Ukraine, and possibly Georgia, want to apply for membership of the apparently wealthy club on their doorstep. Will Belarus, even Russia itself, be far behind? What will we see then in terms of immigration?

So how easy is it for Russians to get into Lithuania during a road or rail crossing from Russia to Kaliningrad? Ironically, it is proving difficult and rare. Last year less than 150 people got caught. It is easy to see why.

All Russian rail passengers and travellers by road are logged on computers at both ends of each journey. Other nationalities are checked but then largely ignored. Two intermediate stops/en-route/by train are used by only a handful of Lithuanians.

One five mile stretch of railway line we visited had 84 cameras, some with heat-seeking sensors, to detect anyone either attempting to cross the line or jumping from a moving train.

The best option was much easier - walk or drive down any small farm lane or walk through the forest or across the heavy farmland at night. The chances of meeting anyone are slim, and the border will not even be identified.

Welcome to the west.

Democracy, Citizenship and Political Engagement

» Democracy (Greek demos, "the people"; keratin, "to rule") is an electoral system that ensures that the majority of the electorate rules and those significant minorities are represented. George Avery says our political system achieves neither of these aims.

» The present government does not qualify to be called a democracy. In last year's General Election just over 27 million people used their vote. The turnout was 61%. Only nine and a half million people voted for the Labour Party, who won the election with a majority of 78 seats. Seventeen and a half million people voted against the Labour Party, yet they were awarded 356 seats as opposed to Tories 197, Lib Dems 62 and others 29.

Only a system of government which reflects on how the nation should be governed, and only if its assembly represents the full diversity of opinion within the nation and its decisions regarded as the decisions of the nation itself, can be called a democracy. Had the seats been awarded in direct proportion to each party's showing it would be Labour 227, Tories 209, Lib Dems 142 and others 66. This can only be achieved by a system of proportional representation such as STV (Single Transferable Vote). Our present system of "first past the post" is archaic and has no place in a modern and educated society. This method of voting means that only on very rare occasions does the result produce a government that represents the majority of the electorate rather than a significant minority.

Our whole electoral system is the most antiquated and inept in the democratic world. Britain is only one of three democracies worldwide that does not have a codified Constitution. The other two are Israel and New Zealand. A codified Constitution is essential to safeguard the rights of the people and to ensure that any changes to the Constitution must be subject to a compulsory referendum.

It must also ensure that either a simple majority or a specified percentage of the electorate can demand a referendum on any controversial subject prior to it becoming effective. We have to go no further than three comparatively recent referenda. On the 29th May 2005 France rejected the European Constitution by 54.87%. Three days later the Netherlands followed suit with a 61.6% rejection. On 4th November 2004 the electorate voted Yes 22.1% and No 77.9% against a North East Regional Assembly. This reflects the potency of the electorate when given the opportunity to participate in politics and the freedom of democracy to flourish.

SCANDINAVIA MOST DEMOCRATIC

Political scientists are claiming that the number of referendums held in Scandinavia during the past 20 years indicates that the region is the most democratic in Europe. They point to the recent Swedish "No" vote against accepting the Euro, and also the two Danish referendums in the 1990s regarding Denmark's entry into the EU. In 1970 and 1972 the Norwegians voted overwhelmingly against joining the EU. Professor Jo Sagli, head of political sciences at Oslo University, told reporters "Referendums are a well established tradition in Nordic countries, it would be difficult to get rid of them".

English local authorities are already empowered to hold referenda. Milton Keynes council conducted a referendum during February 1999, on which they sought the views of the electorate on three options for increasing council tax levels for 1999/2000. The referendum was conducted using powers under Section 141 of the Local Government Act 1972 (relevant to today's local council tax problems?) This should be enlarged and extended to cover the national government as well. Our opinions on issues of the day are just as good, if not better, than the majority of Lib-Lab-Con politicians. We are not tied to the machinations of party politics and any decision would be that of the majority of the populace.

If we are to be trusted to have a vote on the Euro why not on other controversial matters such as identity cards, nuclear proliferation or European Union expansion, for examples? In the case of the House of Lords, when the politicians cannot agree on a solution why not let the people decide? The Government argues that it was not included in their manifesto to do this and those earlier referenda have not become a precondition for constitutional change.

The use of referenda means that power lies not with the government but with the people. It means that the people are virtually the Opposition. Providing that the politicians are governing as the people demand then the need for referenda should be minimal. Of course, the politicians would not like any changes to the status quo. They do not like losing their power; Tony Blair has already reneged on a promise to hold a referendum on electoral reform.

They will try to persuade us that the arguments are far too complex for us to decide. Yet legislation is passed in the House of Commons when even fewer than twenty members are present. How often have you heard that only a handful of MPs have been in the chamber when the debate took place? Yet when the vote is taken at the end of the debate the count is in the hundreds. Our representatives are supposed to listen to the arguments and vote on the merits of the case. The truth is that the party whips decide on what will be voted on and what will not. Referenda mean that all decisions are the will of the people rather than that of a few politicians.

VOTING CURTAILED BY APATHY

It is not the mechanics of the exercise that stops people from voting. It is the apathy brought about by the disillusionment with political parties and politicians. How often has it been said that it doesn't matter which party you vote for, they are all the same, and none of them reflect what we are interested in, only what the politicians want? Once elected a government can do, and does, anything it likes for its full term in office without reference to either Parliament or the electorate.

Socrates, a champion of democracy

At the next election the parties will submit so-called manifestoes to the electorate but they will feel free on whether or not to implement them. The citizen has no say in any treaties that are concluded by or with the EU or any other body. As we have seen, the nation can be involved in a war on the say-so of one man without even the consent of either the cabinet or parliament. Even George Bush had to get the agreement of the US Government for its invasion of Iraq. The politician says he listens; he may do so, but if he hears he rarely heeds. People feel that there is a gulf between the politicians and themselves, and this problem is not just confined to Britain.

The emergence and success of so-called right wing parties throughout the world has brought home to governments that they cannot take the average voter for granted, or that they do so at their peril. You have to go no further than the attacks on the British National Party by the three main parties and their media mouthpieces at every opportunity to have proof of this. This is because more and more voters believe that the BNP is reflecting what they want. Until the traditional parties give the people what they want they will find a party which will. This is reflected in the fact that wherever a British National Party candidate stands in an election then the number of voters overall always goes up.

Compulsory voting will not work, in fact it may be counter-productive as it will be easy enough to spoil ballot papers. Only the incentive of wanting to vote will get the voters out. Recent experiments on alternative voting methods showed only a marginal increase because of the novelty of the systems but it is only a flash in the pan. As outlined above, only some system of proportional representation which will take note of all opinions can give a true democratic answer.

Keynes on Population

» Alastair Harper gives further comment and source acknowledgments to his December 2005 article in Identity on John Maynard Keynes' concern for world population growth.

» Of the two articles on population in the October and December issues, the review of William Stanton's book "The Rapid Growth of Human Populations 1750-2000" (October) and "Was Keynes a Racist" (December), a proper attribution and acknowledgement of a main source of the Keynes article has had to wait until this issue. We acknowledge the information obtained from "Keynes on Population", first published in 2000 by Oxford University Press where Professor John Toye was a visiting professor of Economics, having previously served as Director of Globalisation and Development Strategies of UNCTAD in Geneva.

There is a marked contrast between the two works. Whilst Dr Stanton points fearfully at the future in the looming shadow of a world directly threatened by Third World overpopulation, Prof. Toye's definitive critique of the hitherto unpublished writings on population by Professor

J. M. Keynes dwells in the past.

As an academic economist Prof. Toye is more concerned to cherish the reputation of Keynes, whose genius so affected the economic policies of the Western world in the 20th century, than to illuminate the prophetic utterances on population and race of this celebrated Englishman. Patently Prof. Toye distances himself from what he regards as the crudities of Keynesian thinking on African and Asian peoples, overpopulation of the Third World (as we now know it), race and eugenics.

Considering the complexity and contradictions of much of Keynes' writing on population it is not surprising that Oxford University afforded him a sabbatical year to produce the highly literate and polished exposition of what so few people knew existed.

It is to his credit that Prof. Toye decided to undertake this monumental work and his enlightening book speaks volumes for his honesty of intellectual purpose, since as he admits in his introduction that a great many of his associates in the academic world counselled him to stay silent on what is an acutely embarrassing issue for the contemporary liberal establishment.

How many intellectuals in the West today are suborned by political pressure to remain silent or distort that which runs counter to established liberal socialist doctrine? For his intellectual honesty I take my hat off to Prof. Toye.

I have deliberately separated the foregoing acknowledgement of "Keynes on Population" from the earlier article on the bald statement of the book to allow the reader to appreciate the gulf which lies between my sympathy for what to me and many others is the prophetic element of Keynes' views on population, overpopulation in the Third World and race, and Professor Toye's evident distaste for the elements of Keynes' thought contained in my December article.

Multi-Racialism

Hitler in Reverse

» David Hamilton shows that although they are binary opposites, Nazism and multi-racialism share a common failing of needing something to react against and to blame. With multi-racialism we, the whites, are the scapegoat, even the enemy.

» Multi-racialism and Nazism are binary opposites. Multi-racialism is antithesis to thesis and bound to Nazism by a bond of hatred, but seen by its adherents as a higher moral system to transcend barbarism thus, a civilised response that is irenic and benign without hatred for anyone. Despite this unrealistic belief that they had transcended human nature, the supporters of multi-racialism were human and needed something to react against and to blame for any hiccups in progress.

The one concept of the liberal left's populist philosopher Derrida that makes sense is the idea of binary opposites, or dichotomies. According to Derrida, people think in terms of opposites, which is similar to Robert Ardrey's Amity-Enmity complex.

All things are identified in part by what they are not; the sky is dark but not bright. There are endless dichotomies, like beginning/end, tall/short, masculine/feminine, presence/absence, and speech/writing.

We "Whites" have become what Prof. Roger Scruton has several times described as "the enemy an Ideology needs". Multi-racialism is an ideology even though it is linked with group rights as a part of identity politics, it is also a strand of this type of thinking in its own right and I will treat it separately.

Sir Alfred Sherman, former senior advisor to Mrs. Thatcher wrote in a book review for Salisbury Review (Spring 2003), "I first became aware of mass third world immigration into Britain in the sixties, when an old acquaintance then working in race relations, suggested that I look at the political fall-out from immigration in two "reception areas", Deptford and Southall, with the eyes of a Balkanologist tracing the interplay of culture, nationality, religion, economics and race - I did so and was horrified. My natural vague sympathies for the immigrants was replaced by a strong but hopeless sympathy for the British victims whose areas were being occupied."

We are the enemy, the scapegoat that the growing ideology of multi-racialism needed to define itself. The iniquity is that their dark idea of Nazism was projected on to innocent people instead of real Nazis. With binary opposites you cannot have one without the other, as with multi-racialism and Nazism.

Originally it was a wholly understandable reaction to the barbarity of Hitler's Nazis but had the same structure only inverted. For example, in his television series "Mongrel nation" in June 2003, the clothes horse Eddie Izzard claimed that mongrel dogs are cleverer than pedigree dogs. This metaphor suggested that mongrel people are as a master race, genetically superior to the rest!

Ray Honeyford, who was himself persecuted, but for wanting integration not separation, sincerely believes in the ideal of multi-racialism. Yet his being bullied out of his job shows that unless you agree totally with the multi-racialist ideology you will be hounded. In "Integration or Disintegration" (Claridge Press.1988) p21, he defines racism as:

1 The belief in the genetic superiority of one group of people and the genetic inferiority of another group.

2 The process by which an individual or group is disadvantaged due solely to skin colour.

In "Anti-Racism", Alastair Bonnett writes of Nazism, "...that it is understood that the ideology of the German National Socialist Party may be summarised as a variety of fascism structured around notions of racial supremacy". As we see from Ms/Mr. Izzard, multi-racialism is structured around notions of "mongrel" supremacy.

This multiracial world view has the same structure as the Nazi world view but is inverted. It is this that allows the multi-racialists to project so much of their unrecognised hatreds on to those they fit into this negative category. An example of this is Jack Straw's famous remark that "Racism is Madness". What did he mean? He meant the racism of the old German Nazi party but wrongly attributed it to New Wave Patriotism!

MAKING A MULTI-RACIAL STEW

Where Hitler had proposed a "thousand year Reich" inhabited by a "Master Race" of Pure Aryans, the inverted multi-racial idea is a perfect world made up of a new type of person: the coffee-coloured person. This was to be created from a formula or recipe as if they were making a stew, not playing social engineering games with the lives and happiness of millions of innocent people. It is what Burke saw in the French Revolution as mathematical calculations for perfection in people, but people do not behave as abstractions in a theory.

The French Revolutionaries also tried to manufacture a new type of person through education and persuasion, then force and terror. The Jacobins, like our own Government, set about destroying all institutions that impeded their creation of "Revolutionary Man". The Committee on Public Safety stated: "You must entirely re-fashion a people whom you wish to make free, to destroy its prejudices, alter its habits, limit its necessities, root up its vices, purify its desires." Does that strike a chord?

The one who brought the engine for totalitarianism and oppression into our legal system, The Campaign for Racial Equality, in the 1976 Race Relations Act, was Roy Jenkins. He believed, a biographer, John Campbell (Weidenfield & Nicolson.1983) tells us, "That immigration was good for Britain and if people resisted they should be socially engineered into accepting it. Commonwealth immigrants like previous waves of immigrants from the Norman Conquest (?), to the refugees of the '30s, could help overcome "our natural Island lethargy".

The term "racist" is not descriptive but inhibitive. It is to cow us while our society is transformed from a natural society to the rationalist construct of a multiracial state. The terms Nazi, fascist and racist are interchangeable. After the Second World War, Nazi and Fascist were more coercive, but as the war receded racist became more effective as it was universally pejorative and not restricted to old-fashioned ideologies.

In the second reading of the Commonwealth immigrants Bill (16/11/1961, Lord Royle said, "wouldn't we be better off with a dash of darker blood?"

In Immigration: What is the Answer? The arch Utopian Fenner Brockway wrote glowingly of mixed race people which is unmistakably the same reverence as Nazis had for pure Aryans.

Nick Cohn the rock music journalist -cum-novelist has remarked that the idea of he and his associates, was to put a bit of the black man into the white man.

The groups Hitler regarded as inferior are now being virtually deified, yet those he promoted are now inferior.

It is an idealistic world view where people of practical wisdom would study human nature and learn how people really treat each other and what they are capable of doing to each other rather than pretend we are on the way to perfection. Then they ignore the cruelty being done to us because we are the bearers of all the world's evils, and when we have been destroyed a new era of higher consciousness and multiracial bliss will spontaneously grow from our ruin. If an honest person were to go round and talk to ordinary people they would soon realise that working class people are being pushed out of their homes and communities and no one gives a damn. This is the evil outcome of multi-racialism - cruel dispossession and the destruction of our culture and communities.

While I was writing this I took down Martin Walker's "The National Front" (Fontana. 1977). "I firmly believe that the human race, in 5,000 or 50,000 years will be a uniform coffee colour with a pleasing tinge of yellow and I lustfully believe in accelerating the process"(Page 9). What neither Walker nor any other Utopian ever tells us is, what are the uniting principles that will bring this Chaos of Tribes into harmony? What in practice will change our natures and outgrow thousands of years of history?

The practical effects though are that the Utopians believe very strongly in race but a negative of Hitler as guilt is passed down racially not logically. Otherwise why am I, a man from a poor working class background, deemed guilty of colonialism, slavery and racism? Had I been alive in that era I would have been cleaning the mud off the perpetrators' boots!

This ideology afflicts all of the Western nations, each of which has a different history and a different justification or, I should I say, excuse. Here in England we are told that we must be pushed out because of our Empire and all the wicked things our forbears did to innocent foreigners. In America it is because of the slave trade and what they did to the American Indians. In Ireland, where one in ten of the population is an asylum seeker, it is not because of what they have done to other ethnic groups, but because of what was done to them - they should let everyone in out of empathy. A strange excuse for over-running the native Irish and stealing their country!

The Empire and past behaviour of a people's ancestors is a racist argument to justify destroying us.

After the War the newly independent state of South Africa, was recipient

'Oswald Mosley wanted to produce a new type of political man. He is seen here with a BUF delegation in Italy 1933

"It has produced, not only a new system of government but also a new type of man, who differs from politicians of the old world as men from another planet."

of thousands of our people emigrating. The Conservative M.P. Peter Thornycroft (later Lord) observed in an article "Lets stop This Talk of Emigrating" (Daily Mail 16/7 1948) "The decline of the Roman Empire was presaged by just such a fall of native population, accompanied by an interesting influx from abroad." Despite demonising us as racists, the Empire Windrush was welcomed into Tilbury dock by cheering crowds and boats going out to welcome it.

A NEW TYPE OF PERSON

This blueprint of abstractions that is designed to lead to a multi-racial Utopia, a perfect world on earth where we have all become coffee-coloured, is a rationalist construct, and follows a line of abstract thinking from the Enlightenment.

It attempts to create a new type of person as the main thrust of multi-racialism. The Runnymede Trust agenda is to do this and it really is being done in practice. The aim is to change our identity as if we were mere empty abstractions on a page and is a form of dehumanisation. By modifying our education system, re-inventing our history, imposing a culture of apology, ethnic monitoring and destruction of traditional legal principles which protected personal freedoms of people, it is a transformation to the artificial, rational construction of a multi-racial society.

In Who Do We Think We Are? Yasmin Alibhai-Brown (P103) writes:

"What all of us, black and white Briton's should be wanting is to participate in the creation of a new nation, for the next century, to work with the various tribes of white and black Britain to create something dynamic, to embark on a project as revolutionary as the one taken up by idealists in South Africa, a new country forged after melting down the best bits of the old." (Allen Lane Penguin 2000).

This compares well with Oswald Mosley in 1932 on his return from studying the Fascism of Mussolini in Italy. "It has produced, not only a new system of government but also a new type of man, who differs from politicians of the old world as men from another planet." (Walker.op.cit.p23).

The vice-chair of the Runnymede Trust enquiry Lady Gavron, an intimate of Blair, told the Telegraph that Prince Charles should have married a black woman as a symbol of his support for multi-cultural Britain." (Russell Lewis, "Race Warriors" p44). This was promoted in the '60s and '70s by the now forgotten Shirley Williams.

One should use common sense and concrete terms which refer to the external world and not try to fit everyone into a design created by a priori thinking.

The humanities disciplines can be divided down the middle like a page of Pope's poetry with the caesura. We have Plato on the one side and Aristotle on the other and come down to our own time via Augustine and Aquinas to the Philosophes on one side and Burke opposite.

One only has to read newspaper reports from the 1950's to see how unimportant our people were regarded and if any spoke out they were labelled Nazis and Fascists. There were debates in the papers but not in "the Mother of Parliaments", where our representative politicians were ignoring our interests for those of outsiders. There soon developed what Norman Pannell MP called "a conspiracy of silence" in the matter of immigration.

A key mover in all this was the party that pretended to represent the working class, the misleadingly named Labour party. This Socialist-Marxist alliance with its allies in the TUC repeatedly blocked any discussion on immigration. Most of them took the side of immigrants against working people.

Details are now emerging into the daylight from the dark, secret corners where they have lain for years. It is now widely known that asylum seekers get new accommodation, paid bills and extra social security payments while our own poor struggle. This has provoked great and widespread anger.

To destroy a whole people's trust in their rulers and institutions of Government is a deeply dangerous thing and, even though Blair and his ex-Marxist cronies are building totalitarian structures to hold things together, it is not certain they will be strong enough. Newspapers are now reporting events and even genuine liberals, as opposed to new PC liberals, are calling for an end to this massive wave of immigration.

The multi-racial society was always an unnatural construction and was about as likely to work as the French Revolution, five-year plans of Stalin or the "The Great Leap Forward".

Until the asylum seeker crisis brought about by Blair and Blunket, most people had been conditioned into wanting to build a multi-racial society. It was thought to be moral progress from the atrocities committed by Hitler's Nazis. The far-right parties apparently had only the less educated, and therefore less cultured and aware sections of society to support them. Educated people regarded them on a continuum ranging from thick and pathological to plain evil. It was almost a music hall turn to crack jokes about how thick, uneducated and ignorant supporters of the old National Front were.

WHITE MINORITY

Lee Jasper, special adviser to London Mayor, Ken Livingstone told The Observer (03/09/2000) that whites will be a minority in the capital by 2010, just over four years away.

The inverse Lebensraum is our Government offering inducements to foreigners to come here. In a recent interview on Talk Sport, Anne Widdicombe confirmed that asylum seekers "have been given Social Security money to buy cars." If they have children they get better houses than our own people. They also get free mobile phones, do not pay rent, water, gas or electricity bills. This is giving them inducements to come here, but why leave their own countries? A very enlightening article appeared in The Spring 2003 issue of the Salisbury Review, by African Dele Oguntimioju:

"(You) do not know how the youth in the poor African village is being seduced by lush advertising to shed his native dress for blue jeans; to retune his ears from the traditional hi-life to the drum and bass of hip-hop and Brit pop. Even now the British Council is busy across Africa training the next generation of immigrants in the language of the destination country."

We are being treated with hidden contempt by our own Government while immigrants are privileged; we are the new untermenschen.

THE RUNNYMEDE TRUST - try to 'realise the vision' of a multi-racial future for Britain

Realising the Vision

Progress and further challenges

Foreword

The Report on the Future of Multi-Ethnic Britain had a difficult birth, and was the subject of much misunderstanding and misrepresentation. It is now so for two true reasons. First, the Report criticised the currently dominant conservative, liberal and Marxist misconceptions of the place of ethnic minorities in British society and offered instead a paradigm that sought to recognise the complexity of equality and difference as well as those of social cohesion and respect for minority choices. This required the Report to acknowledge old questions, raise new ones, and to develop a new vocabulary. Many who read the Report were not prepared to make the effort to enter into the details of the Report and came to grips with its new perspectives. Secondly, the Report offered a coherent, clear programme and strategic plan for tackling racial discrimination and inequalities, and many of the right were obviously sympathetic to it.

Thanks to the good sense of the British people and the great work of the Runnymede Trust, policy-makers, commentators, and others were eager to take a fresh look at the Report and found it both useful and persuasive. Many of its recommendations have now been implemented, and the large issues relating to British identity, diversity, cohesion and membership of the United Kingdom of the twenty-first century are now being debated in public. Audiences of the Report could not hope for more.

The paper by the Runnymede Trust provides a detailed and well-considered account of the current state of play and points the way for the future. It is a most welcome addition to the debate since the Report was published. However, the basic issues raised by the Report and many of its proposals for dealing with them remain just as relevant as ever.

Who Killed Rover?

» These reflections by R.D.Wolstenholme FRICS, FBEng, a Rover car enthusiast, on the death of the last major British-owned motor manufacturer were sent to us some months ago. We regret that pressure on space has held back publication. However, his conclusions are still very relevant to the demise of British industry today.

» The art of "Rover bashing" was one of the most successful campaigns in the politically correct war of anti-Britishness and, more specifically, anti-Englishness. For that is what it was, for why else relish the demise of a great company with an obviously English badge? Stemming from the trends of the sixties, the metropolitan intelligentsia has controlled our media in a manner that does not so much reflect opinion as form it, in very subtle ways and along pre-determined sociological lines. For these people the most fundamental philosophy is the encouragement of a sense of shame at English traditions, history, culture and "labels". It is actually more subtle than that insofar as nationalism as demonstrated by our Scots, Welsh and Irish compatriots is still thought of as "fascinating" but Englishness is definitely out. The fact that the media hardly mentioned the predicament of Rover customers, many of whom lost their warranties, seems to confirm the view that those who bought the vehicles somehow needed either punishing or had "brought it on themselves".

ROVER CAR A "NATIONALIST STATEMENT"

A couple of years back when I was asked by a German Rover agent to find a British police force that ran Rover cars, in order that a German police order that he had provisionally obtained could be sustained by British police corroboration, I couldn't find one. I even invoked the assistance of my MP, and because no British police force did buy Rovers I thought it pertinent to find out why.

The consistent excuse offered by at least four of them (and incidentally confirmed by an investigation by The Independent) was that buying Rover vehicles "struck an overtly nationalist statement" that could be "offensive" to minority groups, and that police had to take care not to adopt any statement, purchase or comment that could be construed as "nationalistic". The fact that police stations have recently been advised (on Health and Safety grounds) not to fly the Union Flag or the Flag of St.George tends to underline this nonsense.

Some years earlier when representing a client at a Planning Inquiry I had, in order that his interests were not prejudiced, to argue with the procedural arrangements laid down by the Planning Inspector, who just happened to be black. To my astonishment she reported me to the police for "racially aggravated insubordination of a Government officer" and the subsequent police inquiry included a search of my property to discover "racist symbols". One of these transpired to be use of the Union Jack on my flagpole (racist). Another, membership of the Elgar Society, was deemed to indicate an extreme nationalist standpoint. The third, and most bizarre, was ownership of three Rover cars; an overtly nationalist statement and likely - said the police - to offend "vulnerable" groups in society.

I then found that the principle applied wasn't just to Rover, because one of my building contractor clients ran into difficulties in a public sector works contract (where there are standard clauses relating to the banning of overtly British or English characteristics) because he used LDV vans. Further researches discovered Rover was not on the approved tender list for the purchase of vehicles by the rest of the public sector. Every other European (and some American) manufacturer was but not our own wholly owned performer in this sector. Again, the excuse was offered that nationalistic characteristics of the marque (it is the prow of a Viking longship - Editor) could offend people.

The anti-Rover stance continued to be so "spun" or misquoted that for any intelligent person the bias must have been obvious. No one, for instance, pointed out that it was Rover engineers that designed the Mini. No one pointed out that Rover's slump in market share was actually less than many of its competitors. No one pointed out that MG sales had risen dramatically and no one pointed out that elsewhere in Europe Rover was often viewed as a very well made exclusive motor car. This latter point was actually demonstrated in a number of continental TV series.

Having become so appalled at the banality and politically correct message spinning characteristics of much of British TV, I purchased a satellite system that gave me hundreds of channels including many German language. Being a German speaker myself, I noted that on many Austrian drama or police series a Rover car was prominent. One German station prepared a series of Rosamund Pilcher films, using German actors but filmed in South-West England. Virtually every vehicle used in this series was a Rover or an MG - on presumably the touching assumption that English people, like Germans, would naturally tend to buy vehicles made in their own country!

SHUNNED BY ALL GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS

Since the demise of the company the semi-official derision attached to Rover car ownership has become overt. Senior officers in the public sector, police and judiciary are commonly called upon to appear in front of "appropriate tribunals" to assess their on-going suitability for their posts. Junior police officers have told me of veiled instructions given by their seniors not to drive around in British cars. A friend of mine who is a judge was advised to sell his Rover 75 and buy something "more appropriate". This stems from the latest directives to the judiciary and tribunal chiefs, which include an "assessment of witnesses" procedure particularly used for expert witnesses in anything from High Court cases to Health & Safety tribunals. Part of the procedure involves questions about the choice of the expert's motor car, with those running British (and particularly Rover) cars seeming to suffer a loss of credibility through that inadvised act.

I would add that my job involves extensive travelling and meeting clients from all walks of life every day. For a long time prior to the company's demise a Rover car was never seen in the car parks of any major local authority or health service. As far as official government purchasing goes, we had not seen a Rover for years and, come to think of it, Jaguar now seems to be omitted as well.

Rover cars died because of a bad press pressurising a weak company. That press treatment reflected a most peculiar political theory, and one that has never been practised anywhere else in the world. This is the philosophy of national self-loathing, said to be justified on the grounds of not offending minority groups in society, but actually going far deeper than that. This trend is the ultimate process by which the historically independent and patriotic British (and certainly English) can be brainwashed into becoming subservient to a European super-state where, ironically, most other member countries practice patriotism to the ultimate!

At the time of the Rover demise I could not find a newspaper that mentioned the fact that Mercedes Benz had had to recall 1.3 million cars for various faults and that the company had been plunged into the red. Mentioned in only two newspapers and again omitted from the BBC was the fact that Jaguar had to go on a three-day week.

Clearly, the only way you can make and sell cars in Britain is to give them foreign names. If you do that, then the Government, which did its bit to kill Rover, will actually give you a loan, like the ones given to Nissan, Honda, Peugeot and Toyota. They will also give you a priority bulk contract order, like Renault and Fiat in the Health Service (with Fiat proving to be unreliable) and Opel (General Motors) for the Civil Service.

The death of Rover was a symptom, but the disease progresses and among a population that doesn't seem to care one way or the other.

Appeasing Muslim Extremism Will Not Work

For six years the Government, via the Crown Prosecution Service, did nothing to halt the murderous rhetoric of Abu Hamza. Instead, they pursued a policy of appeasement in relation to any Muslim behaviour and utterances that have basically infringed the laws of this land. As I write it looks possible that, due to the public outcry, the CPS may bring charges against some of those Moslem militants who held provocative anti-Danish protests last month with placards and banners calling for beheadings and praising the 7/7 London bombers.

In an editorial of 8th February the Daily Telegraph said that the CPS and the police must act to allay public fears about the selective application of justice. "It is especially necessary after the acquittal last week of BNP leader Nick Griffin, who was prosecuted far more rapidly for uttering statements which... fell far short of the incitement to kill practised by Abu Hamza. Following the BNP case, and the police's failure to arrest anyone at the provocative anti-Danish protests, there is a growing feeling that the law of the land is being applied partially, and, worse, that the police are under political instruction to do so."

As stated in Identity before, the BNP recognises that the type of actions described above are not those of the majority of Muslims living in the UK, who are here for a better life than they had in their homelands. Nevertheless, it is a worrying fact that, according to an ICM poll last month, some 40% of British Muslims want Shari'ah law in parts of Britain. The declared objective of the militants, including many Islamic clerics, is to take over this land and place all of us under Shari'ah Law. This was made clear by Dr Patrick Sookhdeo, a former Muslim who - in danger to his life - became a prominent Anglican cleric, in views expressed in an interview by the Sunday Telegraph of 19th February.

Dr Sookhdeo had canvassed the opinions of Muslim clerics in Britain on the row over the cartoons of images of Mohammed first published in Denmark. "They think they have won the debate," he said. "They believe that the British Government has capitulated to them, because it feared the consequences if it did not." He added: "It's confirmation of what they believe to be a familiar pattern: if spokesmen for British Muslims threaten what they call 'adverse consequences' - violence to the rest of us - then the British Government will cave in. I think it is a very dangerous precedent."

Dr Sookhdeo also said that he believes that "in a decade, you will see parts of English cities which are controlled by Muslim clerics and which follow, not the common law, but aspects of Muslim Shari'ah law. It is already starting to happen."

Further on in the Sunday Telegraph interview Dr Sookhdeo says: "The whole approach towards Muslim militants was based on appeasement. 7/7 proved that that approach does not work - yet it is still being followed. For example, there is a book,

The Noble Koran: New Rendering of its Meaning's in English, which is available in Muslim bookshops. It calls for the killing of Jews and Christians, and it sets out a strategy for killing the infidels and or warfare against them. The Government has done nothing whatever to interfere with the sale of that book."

Freedom of Speech and David Irving

Although I have corresponded with him in the distant past, I have never met David Irving. Having read just two of his books, namely Destruction of Convoy PQ17 and Apocalypse 1945: The Destruction of Dresden, I found him an informative writer providing much detail on his subject. However, I did get the impression that he arranged the presentation of his information in both books in order to give more weight to proving his case (a fault of most political writers!) It seems that this is what he had done with the many books he has written on Germany's National Socialist period, and with his nit-picking over the number of Jews who were slaughtered by that regime and whether or not gas-chambers existed in as many locations, including Auschwitz, as we are told. It is the latter, I believe, that provided the substance of the charge against him in the Austrian court of "Denying the Holocaust".

Whatever one may think of David Irving's views it is a travesty of justice that the man should be given three years in prison for expressing them, particularly as his conviction was based on what he wrote nearly 20 years ago and not his view now, since reading Adolph Eichmann's notes has convinced him that Auschwitz gas-chambers did exist. We know that Austria has a centre right government, but let it also be known that the EU itself has already indicated that it wants to hand out similar sentences to not only deluded holocaust deniers but also those who express views on racial differences.

What happened in that awful European blood bath of sixty years ago (where at least 20 million non-Jews were also slaughtered) is losing much of its relevance to the common threat now facing Europe of today. If we deplore the harsh sentence given to a man for expressing his views, it does not mean that we belittle the killing of Jews. If it was not six million, then it was certainly millions: and if it was but a single one, that was one too many.

A British Apartheid State

In last month's editorial we made passing reference to the fact that one in five births in Britain in 2004 were to non-British born mothers and in five London boroughs it was over 70%. The figures came from the government's own Office for National Statistics and showed that for Greater London as a whole the figure was 49%. Outside of London, Slough produced 48% of new babies from mothers born overseas, Luton 44%, Leicester 38%, Cambridge 36% and Birmingham 34%.

A most important issue is that the birth figures did not take into account those born of descendants of former immigrants to the UK. Couple this with the "chain migration" factor, only mentioned by the immigration think tank MigrationWatch, which means that as a result of finding partners from overseas even higher proportions of births are produced by communities of Pakistani and Bangladeshi origin.

The sheer number of children of non-original British origin means that in less than a decade the process of ghettoisation, the creation of an Apartheid Britain, will arise in many areas. The number of native British born youngsters will be so small or even non-existent as the dwindling numbers of white parents continue to flee to areas where they feel more comfortable and safe (at present), that integration into the host community will be impossible.

What is happening in London and most large towns and cities is not integration, because there are not enough native Britons left, but wholesale colonisation and replacement of our native population. This is a direct consequence of Labour's open door policy on immigration (inspired by a quest for new votes), and which appears to be of no concern to the Cameronlite Tories or the ailing Lib Dems. The BNP has a maximum of two decades to turn this round: otherwise the ancient British lands are finished.

Boris The Turk and His 'Dream of Rome'

The TV two-part programme centred on Boris Johnson's new book The Dream of Rome suggested that although it has considerable reader interest, he has approached his subject with a 21st century multi-cultural outlook. For example, in making a plea for us to accept Turkey into the EU, one of his reasons was "because Turkey, after all, was where the (Roman) Empire survived for another 1,000 years until 1453." Perhaps the other reason, which he divulged at the end of the programme, was that, in spite of his blond hair, his grandfather was Turkish.

After Rome was sacked by the Goths, The Eastern half of the Roman Empire was continued by the Greeks who, together with the ancient Persians and Syrians, inhabited what is now modern day Turkey until the arrival of the Turkoman peoples from inner Asia in the late 10th century AD. Converting to Islam these Ottoman Turks soon set about massacring those Christians who would not convert and colonising the land, which only then became known as Turkey.

Boris Johnson also told us that the people, and particularly the leaders, of the conquered provinces were eager to become part of the Roman Empire. "They turned their smiling faces towards this second source of light and basked in its radiance."

The noble Vercingetorix the leader of the Celtic Gauls (in modern France), didn't quite go along with this when he surrendered to Julius Caesar after one million of his people had been slaughtered. And there was no smiling face when he was pulled through the streets of Rome in a cage to be publicly strangled.

Crossing the Channel to Britain, Boudicca and her daughters were not over happy either to accept the Roman rule. Perhaps the only smiling faces were when she sacked Roman Colchester.

We must accept Boris's humour when he describes Ancient Britons "readily going into the Roman baths and washing off their woad". I thought it was now widely recognised that the British climate was such that the cultured Celts did not walk around naked. Woad was only applied by their warriors as an appeal to their gods and as camouflage when going into battle.

One Hundred*

Another soldier died today
Casualty of a roadside bomb
Planted by enemies unseen,
Supposedly to right a wrong.

For we do not belong out there
Our troops, pawns in a bloody war,
Protracted, pointless, self-induced
By rulers, heedless of the law.

One hundred soldiers, sacrificed
For what? We're told, 'democracy';
The WMDs don't exist
We've all be fooled preposterously!

And so the carnage carries on,
As no one dares to pull the plug.
For those who lead us gutless are
They're cowering in the hole they've dug.

One hundred brave and honest souls
Who signed up to defend our land!
One hundred lives are now snuffed out,
Their blood spilt on the desert sand.

But we will long remember them,
Those victims of Iraqi ire.
Their names will live forevermore
Within the hearts of those who care.

LETTER OF THE MONTH

>> Rough and Ready

In the interest of our Party I feel I must make the following constructive comments.

The national TV news covering Nick and Mark's trial showed them leaving court smartly dressed and looking good on camera. However, I am sorry to say that the entourage with them, whilst smartly dressed, gave an impression of being "rough and tough".

The media's portrayal of our membership likes to pretend that we are all simple misguided racist thugs with swastikas tattooed on our faces and Union Jacks on our necks (such as in a recent Judge John Deed programme on BBC 1). I feel that we must do nothing to portray this image ourselves, as I am sure that appearance in politics is very important if we are to attract more votes.

This is not meant as a personal criticism. I would probably look a bit rough and tough myself on film, so I should not be filmed as representing the Party (if my hair would grow I would not crop it short).

Jeff Brooks
Nottingham

I would not belittle Jeff's comments but it must be remembered that the BNP security team were there to prevent a re-run of the public murder of such critics of Islam as Pym Fortun and then the film maker Theo Van Gogh (a descendant of van Gogh), both in Holland. One of our security men interviewed on the BNP website explained how their job meant that when they left home they did not know whether they would see their wife and children again. Although our 'rough and tough' security team will try and look less aggressive, I understand they draw the line at holding a rose between their teeth. - Editor.

>> Looking Forward To A Better Britain

During the forthcoming local elections I suggest the slogan "Looking Forward to a Better Britain. This, I believe, suggests optimism, implies vision and is not overly complicated. Moreover, during the elections we should encourage our supporters in those seats we are not contesting to write BNP next to the name of every candidate on the ballot paper, and encourage their friends to do the same.

Apart from the fact that election officials and council employees at the count will all see this, it is a way for us to start fighting in every seat. Thus, our supporters with no candidates will feel less isolated and part of something much bigger. People need to get into the habit of voting and promoting the BNP. We should never miss out on the opportunity to legally and freely advertise ourselves.

Peter Francis
Leicester

>> Where Are The Jobs

Polly Toynbee was interviewed on the Today programme recently and she was adamant that the government's Welfare to Work programme was having an effect in encouraging many of those on incapacity benefit back into work. She trumpeted a target of 100,000 back in work annually. I think not. Even if these people wanted a job, the jobs they might have done have now been taken by the legions of cheap imported labour encouraged into this country by our own government. This is the same government who, while they found it impossible to estimate the number of illegal immigrants in this country, confidently predicted that on the accession of the new eastern European countries to the EU only about 13,000 would be coming here to work!

My own experience tells me there must be closer to a million now in this country. I am a graduate with 20+ years experience in IT and have been looking for a job for six months now without success. This Labour government is either incompetent or, more likely, downright liars.

>> Onward Christian Soldiers

Recent articles in Identity have described how Islam was spread across the world by military conquest. This is true but in many instances Christianity was spread in almost exactly the same way. It was Charlemagne the grandson of Charles Martel who converted the Saxons and the Lombards at the point of a sword in 785. This was at the behest of Pope Adrian I who extended the Christian Empire from the Ebro to the Elbe. Pope Leo III crowned Charlemagne Holy Roman Emperor on Christmas day 800 and confirmed the dominance of the Christian religion and the Latin language.

The Americas were also converted by military might. This began in 1520 when Hernando Cortez killed over 50,000 defenders of Mexico City in the cause of Christian evangelism. During the time of Spanish and Portuguese conquest Native Americans were slaughtered in multitudes.

The image of gentle missionaries preaching the gospel to grateful savages is far from the truth. Christianity is the religion of Europe; it is ingrained in our culture and we are right to defend it. As a faith it has many noble qualities and it was the cement that bound Europe together; but it has been just as militaristic as Islam.

Bill Baillie
South London

We would remind readers that Identity and the BNP are secular, i.e. we are not a religious movement, and therefore are non-sectarian. Although many of our readers are practicing Christians, others are agnostics, atheists and even pagans. However, we maintain that Christianity is ingrained in our culture (as Bill Baillie rightfully puts it) and should be supported. We reject ridiculous charges from the odd reader who puts his religious beliefs before any political viewpoint that we are "promoting Roman Catholicism" or, in contrast, "Protestant Puritanism" - Editor

>> Gay Weddings - Where Are They?

Much media attention has been given to so-called gay weddings since they have become lawful. The most illustrious duo to have held a ceremony are Sir Elton John and his partner David Furnish. Others include all manner of freaks, publicity-seekers and exhibitionists (plus some who got on with it quietly - Editor).

What is remarkable about these events is the numbers. Although 500 names are on the list in Brighton, the so-called 'Gay Capital' of Britain, in most cities the names can be counted in dozens. Now why is that?

When our Government foisted this distasteful piece of legislation upon us we were led to believe that there were tens of thousands of homosexual twosomes who could not wait for the opportunity to tie the knot. Officials suggested that 40,000 homosexual couples would wed each year. This figure has now been lowered to 1,000 and, in light of the lack of interest shown so far, will drop even further.

The fact is, of course, that there never was a massive build-up of frustrated would be "grooms and grooms" or "brides and brides"! They are nothing but sham weddings.

>> Home From Home

It's on the cards that Britain is to become a Third World country, according to Paul Hunter, professor of health protection at the University of East Anglia (Daily Mail, p 42, January 5th). Owing to climate change there will be mosquitoes and resultant malaria, salmonella, and wide spread water pollution in the late part of this century. I am not surprised: we already have massive increases in TB and AIDS. Perhaps leprosy will become "normal" too!

Considering that half of London's babies are born to migrants already, the above future scenario will seem just like "home" to many in a black, brown and coffee-coloured Britain, if it's still called that.

Andrew K. Murray

>> PC Stop And Search

As someone who commutes from Kent to London, my daily journey is a bind I could do without. As if the late, overcrowded and dirty trains are not enough I now have another misery to contend with: stop and search.

Changing from an over-ground train to the Northern Line tube I was stopped by a British Transport Police officer who invoked the Terrorism Act 2000 in order to search my bag.

He explained that since the 7/7 suicide bombings bag searches were being introduced as part of the anti-terrorism campaign by the various law enforcement agencies. What struck me as ludicrous was that the Islamic terrorists who attacked us on 7/7, as well as those of the failed 21/7 attack, were all Muslims of Asian or Black racial origin, whereas I am a white European Christian. Even more ludicrous was the fact that while I was being searched a number of Black and Asian men (many holding bags) walked past without the police officers present batting an eye lid.

Instead of this politically correct policing what we need is ethnic profiling. In any war, including against terrorism, the most important aspect of a military campaign is to know your enemy. If liberal multi-cultural dogma continues to be forced on the British police then more terrorist atrocities will happen. What price human life at the altar of the sacred cow of multi-racialism?

>> George Orwell Was Right

I was in Leeds with many of our stalwarts for two of the court appearances of Nick Griffin and his co-accused. On each occasion we were corralled behind a barrier opposite the actual building in which Nick and Mark Collett were called to account for themselves. Looking up to this building we could see persons with high-tech surveillance cameras and listening devices, which they were training on all of us, photographing us and recording our conversations.

I wish more of our folk were aware of this. George Orwell eat your heart out; things have become far worse then even you could envisage.

>> Who Should Own The Land?

A recent BBC programme on land-owners in Britain reported that 90% of the population live on just 10% of the land. What, if anything, does the BNP propose to do about this?

In the past you have indicated in your publications that the BNP is in favour of Distributism, a political philosophy developed by G K Chesterton which advocates that land be distributed as widely as possible. However, Distributism concerns only land used as a means of production, so the question remains: what about land used as living space?

Why Britain needs hard industries

» A key factor in maintaining manufacturing industries is that they will sustain well-paid jobs far more effectively than the service economy. This, and other advantages of keeping our 'hard' industries, are explained by Alan Goodacre

» One of the biggest myths holding the British economy back is that we can - even must - forget about manufacturing, and stake our future prosperity on service industries. The images used to peddle this are easy enough to understand: on the one hand, the glitz of London's financial centre, on the other, some abandoned factory in the North of England. The tacit implication is: here are your choices; which would you rather have?

The Blair government, and most of the rest of the establishment, are great enthusiasts for the post-industrial economy, probably because it makes Labour feel modern and makes Tories feel that the old nightmare at the base of their brains - a militant industrial working class - can never again rise from the dead. The establishments of both parties are deeply intertwined with the owners and managers of the service industries, from investment banking to advertising, so they also have strong purely material interests in the post-industrial myth, too.

Too bad it isn't true. For in fact, empirical evidence from other nations makes quite clear that not only is manufacturing not, as we are told, a 'sunset' part of the economy, even in the developed world, it is in fact one of the best economic sectors for a nation to have a strong presence in, because of its ability to produce sustainable well-paid jobs for ordinary workers. In this, it significantly surpasses the service economy.

Please note this isn't true for all manufacturing. It's true for advanced, that is high-tech, manufacturing. Most of what you've heard about the obsolescence of manufacturing is indeed true, if you're talking about primitive forms of it. The stamping out of plastic toys and similar items is indeed an intrinsically low-paying industry, because it can be performed by illiterate peasants in Shanghai, and therefore anyone else performing it is in competition with such low-paid people. Such industries are very difficult for a high-wage (by world standards) nation like Britain to retain, and don't pay very well, simply because what they produce is so cheap that little money per worker is generated. So while there is no excuse for abandoning workers in our older industries to their fate, we can't look to such industries as motors of future prosperity.

ADVANCED MANUFACTURING

But it is an entirely different story for the manufacture of things like computer chips, aeroplane parts, and medical devices. Companies can't do this with illiterate peasant labour. This is why it tends to get done, even today, with highly-skilled and well-paid labour in places like Bavaria, California, and Kyushu. This is the kind of manufacturing we need. Below is a partial list of advanced manufacturing industries, to make clear how vast the opportunities are:

1. Flat-panel displays for laptops, TVs and other devices.
2. Steel-alloy pipes for transporting oil, which sound primitive but are in fact very sophisticated due to the subtle corrosion-resistant alloys involved and the difficulty of making them in the large sizes that require the least final assembly.
3. Synthetic fibres. Although sewing clothes is low-tech, turning a barrel of crude oil into convincing synthetic silk is not.
4. Photolithographic steppers, the machines used to turn the designs of silicon chips into actual chips.
5. Bearings, ball and otherwise, are a classic seemingly old and dull product that has quietly adapted with the times to become frequently very high-tech.
6. Electric power generators, which are unseen but expensive and ubiquitous.
7. Capacitors, and other obscure but important electronic components.

8. Textile-making machinery like ultra-fast modern looms.

9. Laser diodes, which make CD players work.

10. Nickel hydride batteries, the tiny high-quality ones that are vital for cell phones, camcorders, etc.

11. Robotics, an industry that is not only valuable in itself, but buttresses other manufacturing industries by making readily available the know-how to automate production of other things.

12. Cameras, both conventional and digital, still and motion.

13. Machine tools, which are, of course, the ultimate key to making other manufactured goods.

14. Avionics and aeroplane parts.

15. Watch movements.

16. Ship engines. How do you think all those imports get here?

17. Photocopiers, especially their key electro-optical components.

18. Carbon fibre, an emerging material that is replacing metals in key applications.

19. Construction equipment, which is often a lot more sophisticated than it looks.

20. Titanium, an emerging metal with high strength to weight ratio.

21. Medical devices.

22. Equipment for nuclear power plants.

23. High-tech weaponry, including counter-terrorist equipment like bomb sniffers.

24. Green power devices, like fuel cells and the generators, control units, towers and blades of windmills.

25. Pollution control equipment, like sulphur dioxide scrubbers, and pollution detection devices.

(This list is adapted from Eamonn Fingleton's In Praise of Hard Industries, the best, and very readable, book on this topic).

Note that much advanced manufacturing involves products - fibres, pipes, bulldozers - that one would not think of as advanced, but are in fact more subtly made than one imagines. Advanced manufacturing often centres on the key components of products rather than the products themselves. Many consumer products, for example, consist of technically-advanced components surrounded by a commonplace plastic package that is easy to make. The outside of a fax machine, for example, will say 'made in China', simply because final assembly was done there, with unskilled labour. But the bit that really matters - and accounts for most of the cost, and wages paid - is the electro-optical read-write head. This is a sophisticated piece of equipment, made by highly-trained and well-paid labour in some developed country, like Japan.

Also note - especially in reference to the last five items - that these products are very much not 'sunset industries', but things for which demand will boom for years to come, due to fundamental trends like the rising cost of energy, the increasing need to protect the environment, and the threat of terrorism.

The whole 'sunset industries' concept is an excuse for national failure in manufacturing. The only real 'sunset industries' in manufacturing are ones that run on unskilled labour, and they're not setting as such; they're just moving where labour is cheap.

Any other industries we've lost, it's our own fault. Automobile manufacturing, for example, is very much not a sunset industry, and Rover might be where Toyota is today if not for the short-termism of its owners, the bloody-mindedness of its unions, and government indifference to its decline. In 1968, British Leyland was the 3rd largest carmaker in the world!

POST-INDUSTRIAL ECONOMY

Enthusiasts of the post-industrial economy are simply not honest about its drawbacks:

1. Jobs in computer software, finance, management consulting, and similar fields may be highly paid, but it usually takes a college degree to get one. 56% percent of college-age Britons are not going to get a college degree (Source: Higher Education Statistics Agency). And exactly half the population, by definition, has a below-average IQ, so many people probably can't be college educated, even if they can afford it, are still young enough, and have sufficient school preparation. Without alternatives to the information economy, many of these people are doomed to a low standard of living for their entire lives.

In contrast, advanced manufacturing reliably creates a wide spectrum of jobs at all skill levels, and is particularly rich in the crucial category of the skilled blue-collar jobs that ordinary working-class people have a plausible chance of holding. Good jobs in advanced manufacturing require training, but they require the kind of training that one can get in specialised courses at community college, at a technical institute, or through an on-the-job apprenticeship programme run by the company or the union. (By the way, perhaps this would be a better occupation for unions than class warfare, party politics, or the promotion of multi-culturalism?)

2. The information economy is intrinsically limited in terms of how many good jobs it can create, simply because it is limited in how large a portion of the economy it can be. This is because information is only a limited part of the 'value chain' that makes up the final price of any product. The value of a programmer who creates a website to sell DVD players is necessarily limited to some fraction of the value-added of retailing the product, which is only a small part of its overall value. That value is made up of researching, designing, manufacturing, distributing, marketing, wholesaling, retailing and servicing it. If we cede the manufacturing link of the value chain to foreigners, this means ceding a large piece of potential economic activity and the jobs that flow to whom ever performs that activity. Worse, it often also means ceding related jobs, like design, parts and materials procurement and logistics, plus jobs in supplier industries.

3. Britain is limited in what share of the world market for internationally-traded services it can win. Other nations want this business too, and they are getting better at winning it all the time. The Internet only makes this easier. For example, many societies whose overall economies are still primitive, like Russia and India, have developed elites of computer programmers whose salaries are a fraction of British levels. The current strength of the City of London is vulnerable to the growth in sophistication of the financial sectors of other nations. It is also vulnerable, even if the top jobs stay in London, to 'hollowing out' as the 'back office' jobs get relocated abroad. The more globalised our economy, and the more dependent on foreign markets for the services we produce, the more vulnerable we are to this.

4. A related problem is that post-industrial jobs may be highly paid, but many of them have limited export potential. British advertising agencies and accounting firms may have branches all over the world, but the need to handle local languages and other peculiarities guarantees that they mostly employ foreigners, most of the value-added takes place overseas and only a relatively small trickle of profits and jobs come back to Britain. And the highest reaches of British finance, which really can export services all over the world, are simply not big enough, in relation to our entire economy, to make up for our trade deficit in manufactured goods. A trade deficit means that we must either gradually sell off the country's existing assets to foreigners, or sink into debt to them.

There is an emerging hierarchy in the world economy in which the best-paid jobs are clustered in certain nations. If Britain wants to be a sustainably prosperous nation with well-paid workers, we must explicitly compete for these jobs.

NO LOYALTY

This cannot possibly be a matter of laissez-faire indifference in any sane society. It cannot be repeated often enough that the free market has no loyalty to this country, and does not care if we thrive or starve. One must respect the genuine insights of free-market thinking, but always remember that the market is a game to be played to win. It is neither a divine law to be passively submitted to in the naive expectation that all is for the best, as the Tories and New Labour say, or an arbitrary invention of capitalists that of manufacturing - are low in status, compared with lawyers, bankers, consultants, or advertising men. They are assumed to be dull, unimpressive personalities. How many famous manufacturers does one ever hear about? Everyone knows who wrote the most trivial pop songs, but who can name the engineers who designed even our greatest technological achievements, like Concorde or the Severn Bridge?

This is not so in other countries: in Germany, engineering is associated with the glamour of BMW, Mercedes, and other top automobile producers. The profession is similarly respected in Japan, Korea, and other East Asian nations. Naturally, in these nations, manufacturing attracts some of the can be casually over-thrown, as socialists say.

So why does Britain, once the workshop of the world, lag so badly in the field of advanced manufacturing?

1. A culture of disrespect for the field

Even though the old British 'gentlemen don't go into trade' nonsense more-or-less died in the Thatcher years, it did huge damage from about 1800 to 1980, and was then replaced by a slick yuppie version of the same attitude, which considered manufacturing to be a dead-end and unfashionable industry. Engineers - the officer class best minds in the country, and the results show it.

2. Lack of government attention

British governments, past and present, have simply not taken the needs of the manufacturing sector seriously. Labour governments allowed the unions to run amok and destroy entire industries, like automobiles. Conservative ones despised the people who worked in manufacturing, wrote off manufacturing regions as places that didn't vote for them, and allowed the pound to rise on the back of oil revenues, pricing British manufactures out of the world market. Both governments built poor road and rail infrastructure, compared with other European nations.

When our governments have taken manufacturing seriously, as in the attempt of the Wilson government to broker mergers to create national champions in key industries, they have often employed dubious economic strategies, infected with half-baked socialist ideas, about what makes an industry internationally competitive. They applied the anti-monopoly laws in a manner that hindered crucial intra-industry cooperation in such things as shared research and development, rather than helping create the institutions for same. And they practiced doctrinaire free trade, giving producers in other nations open access to the British market without extracting real market access in return.

3. Our poor education system.

Skilled workers are one of the biggest factors that draw advanced manufacturing jobs to high-wage nations. But British policy has tended to assume that only white-collar jobs are desirable and that all blue-collar jobs are undesirable. It would be far better to have strong industrial-arts and apprenticeship programmes like

Germany has, than to divide every high school into "college-bound" and "loser" tracks. And without solid basic education, you can forget apprenticing later on to learn numerically-controlled machine tool operation, or anything like it. Part of our problem is the New Labour myth that the class system has vanished, which causes us to be in denial about the fact that 40% of this country is working class and is going to have blue-collar jobs. Such people can't just be told to become something they're not.

4. Our low savings rate.

This may seem to have nothing to do with advanced manufacturing per se, but this is wrong, because it is of the very essence of advanced manufacturing that it is highly capitalised. It requires vast capital both for research and development and for plant and equipment. This money has to come from somewhere, i.e. from somebody's decision to save and invest part of their income. It is a globalist myth that it doesn't matter if Britain doesn't generate enough investment capital domestically, because we can just import the stuff. This is wrong because:

a. Empirical data show that a good supply of domestic capital is still more likely to lead to investment, as capital doesn't flow perfectly across borders (nor should it).

b. Dependency on foreign capital means we have to run our economy like a tart on the streets of global capitalism, always pimped to be attractive for other people's money, and setting everything from interest rates to worker-protection laws to please them.

c. This tends to make Britain the location of branch plants and other secondary productive facilities, not of the headquarters that, in the long run, are the creative core of a company and the fount of its best jobs. Having a Sony, BMW, or Boeing plant is better than not having one at all, but having the Sony head quarters would mean a lot more.

d. Relying on foreign capital means that even if the jobs are created in the UK, the profits earned by this capital accrue to another nation's wealth, not ours. So our stock of capital fails to grow.

e. This means turning ownership, and thus control, of much of our economy to foreigners. When their economic interests coincide with ours this is tolerable, but they often won't, and on fundamentals they never will.

Jean Thomas has been at the forefront of building the BNP's elite fund raising club the Trafalgar Club for the last six years. The TC began very small with only a handful of people, but has grown tremendously over the last six years and now contains several hundred members. This increase is almost certainly due to the hard work and efficiency of Jean and her dedicated helper who have meticulously filled in and returned Trafalgar Club cards every month, organised the superb annual dinners and issued the gifts to new and long standing members.

After the last Trafalgar Club meal last October, it was announced that Jean was to step down, due to her increasing workload in the enquiries department, and my wife Suzy and I were to take over. After getting Christmas, holidays and other party business out of the way, at long last we have been able to take some of the weight off Jean's shoulders.

I would like to thank Jean for all her hard work, and I along with my wife Suzy feel very privileged to be asked to continue building on her success. There will be teething problems like there always are when takeovers happen, but we assure you we will do all we can to keep these at a minimum. Please note our change of address.

I look forward to meeting you all at the next TC dinner.

Regards
Nick Cass

Help Us To Help Britain -

By Building a Power Winning Machine

It's only a matter of time before a new atrocity by Islamic terrorists drives another nail into the coffin of the multi-racial 'experiment'. When that happens, popular support for the British National Party will see another surge forward. And, sooner or later, some such event is going to trigger a seismic shift in British public opinion.

The question isn't "will it happen?" but "will we be able to cope?" That's why we're putting a great deal of effort into organisational improvements.

Building a really professional campaigning machine costs large amounts of money. We believe that failure is not an option. What about you?

Yes, I want to help build the BNP's power-winning machine. I'm glad to be able to enclose

When they are binary opposites, common failing of needing the enemy. With multi-racialism we, enemy.

ance, and speech/writing. We "Whites" have become what Roger Scruton has several times described as "the enemy an Ideology". Multi-racialism is an ideology though it is linked with group as a part of identity politics, it is a strand of this type of thinking in own right and I will treat it separately. Mr Alfred Sherman, former senior advisor to Mrs. Thatcher wrote in a review for Salisbury Review (Aug 2003), "I first became aware of third world immigration into Britain in the sixties, when an old acquaintance then working in race relations, suggested that I look at the racial fall-out from immigration in two 'reception areas', Deptford and Bethnal Green, with the eyes of a sociologist tracing the interplay of culture, nationality, religion, economics and race - I did so and was amazed. My natural vague sympathies for the immigrants was replaced by a strong but hopeless sympathy for the British victims whose areas were being occupied."

We are the enemy, the scapegoat that the growing ideology of multi-racialism needed to define itself. The iniquity is that their dark idea of Nazism was projected on to innocent people instead of real Nazis. With binary opposites you cannot have one without the other, as with multi-racialism and Nazism.

Originally it was a wholly understandable reaction to the barbarity of Hitler's Nazis but had the same structure only inverted. For example, in his television series "Mongrel Nation" in June 2003, the clothes horse Eddie Izzard claimed that mongrel dogs are cleverer than pedigree dogs. This metaphor suggested that mongrel people are as a master race, genetically superior to the rest!

Ray Honeyford, who was himself persecuted, but for wanting integration not separation, sincerely believes in the ideal of multi-racialism. Yet his being bullied out of his job shows that unless you agree totally with the multi-racialist ideology you will be hounded. In "Integration or Disintegration" (Claridge Press.1988) p21, he defines racism as:

1 The belief in the genetic superiority of one group of people and the genetic inferiority of another group.

2 The process by which an individual or group is disadvantaged due solely to skin colour.

In "Anti-Racism", Alastair Bonnett writes of Nazism, "...that it is understood that the ideology of the German National Socialist Party may be summarised as a variety of fascism

FREAK - Eddie Izzard lectures us on how mixed race origins are superior structured supremacy. Izzard, not around supremacy.

This is the same structure but is inverted multi-racialism. Their unreality they fit in. For example, a remark that 'What did racism of but wrong Patriotism'.
